THE MARQUETTE ARRIVES.

HER LONG TRIP DUE TO HEAVY WEATHER -PASSENGERS NOT ALARMED.

The Atlantic Transport liner Marquette arrived here yesterday from London, about nine days late. The long voyage was due to the extremely heavy weather encountered, and to the fact that the steamer had a small cargo. Consequently, she stood high out of the water, and the wind had so much the better mark. The few passengers were not at all alarmed over the long trip, but they were glad to see land again. They were in ignorance that a serious leak, due to the breaking of several rivets, had flooded compartment No. 2, forward, and that for days the pumps were kept at work to keep the steamer from pumps were kept at work to keep the steamer from settling at the head. A number of cattlemen were returning on the ship, and they were set at work and kept at it in gangs until the steamer reached her pier. Captain Gates said yesterday that as the coal was consumed the ship became so light that she was like a giant bladder on the surface of the sea. She was blown far south of her usual course. New Year's Day only ninety-three knots were logged and on January 9 only eighty knots.

When the Marquette was one day out one of the cattlemen named Louis Thomas fell through an open hatchway, and was killed. He was buried at sea.
